

Social Security Benefits Eligibility Questions

Q: Is it possible to receive partial Social Security benefits for a partial disability?

A: In the world of social security benefits, there are not many clear cut answers. But this question has one; and that answer is "no." While other benefits systems, such as veteran benefits, will provide partial benefits for partial disability, Social Security benefits will not. As far as the Social Security Administration is concerned, a person is either disabled or he or she is not. With Social Security benefits, you are either disabled or you are not disabled, and therefore either approved or denied.

Q: My doctors say that there is no treatment that can help me, so why do I have to keep going to doctors?

A: Even if a doctor cannot treat your disability, seeing a medical professional is a very important part of having your Social Security benefits claim approved. Why is this? Getting medical attention is key because the documentation it creates is a huge part of proving your disability and receiving social security benefits. For proof of your disability, the SSA will thoroughly explore your medical records. If there is little or no medical documentation of your disability, there is an overwhelming chance that your Social Security benefits claim will be denied.

When applying for Social Security benefits, the SSA considers it your own responsibility to document and track the progress of your disability. If you are applying or plan to apply for Social Security benefits, it is very important to regularly see a doctor; even if you're not receiving treatment. During each visit, assure that your doctor documents your symptoms and your condition. The more documentation and evidence you have for your disability, the better your chances of getting social security benefits.

Q: My disability allows me to work, but I cannot earn the same amount of money I did before. Can I still file for Social Security benefits?

A: In this case, yes, you can apply for social security benefits. But this does not necessarily mean that your claim will be accepted. When calculating a claimants eligibility for Social Security benefits, one of the most important questions they will ask is whether or not your disability allows you to do the work you did previously. If you cannot do that same work, they will then try to determine whether or not you can make a substantial income in another type of position. In essence, whether or not you will qualify for Social Security benefits will depend on what kind of work you would be able to do, and how much you might earn.
