

Have you heard about 5linx?

Have you heard about 5linx? I had not, until just recently, and I found out that it is an interesting new VoIP and video phone service. Before I had heard of 5linx, I had thought that this type of thing was a thing of the future, but it seems that my idea of the future is really here today, thanks to the folks at 5linx. When I wanted to find out more about them and their services and what they are, all I had to do was type "5linx" in to the search bar on my web browser window, and in no time, the search engine had returned all the information I needed to find so that I could become more educated about 5linx. If I wanted to see people's face while we had a conversation from a distance, I think that I would want to try the 5linx services. It seems pretty cool to be able to do that kind of thing, although, to tell you the truth, I have not tried it myself yet, so I cannot say for sure; the service may not be all that it is cracked up to be; only time and experience will tell. I hope I get to try out 5linx in the near future, but I have just found out about it, so I do not know how easy it is get started. I am sure I could find all sorts of information about that kind of thing on their web site, but, unfortunately, tonight is a busy night for me, what with band practice and all, and I simply do not have time to research their services at this time. However, later tonight, if I still have the energy, I know what I will be doing online; researching this new VoIP and video phone service to see if their prices, equipment, and services fit with my wants, needs, and budgetary restrictions.
