

Can You Apply for Social Security Disability in Person?

Q: What can you do to get by financially when your claim for social security disability is still being processed?

A: It can take quite some time for an application for social security disability to go through the review process. Supporting yourself while you wait can be quite stressful. Knowing that the review process can take time, a first step is to plan ahead financially. Try to eliminate all spending that is not mandatory. Even if you can pay for those things now, you need to have a financial cushion should your claim take a year or two. Try to put savings away for the sole purpose of supporting you through the long wait that may happen with your social security disability application. Mandatory expenditures can sometimes be adjusted to allow flexibility during the waiting period. Some gas and electric companies have aid programs for those with limited income to help pay for winter heating bills. Restructuring a mortgage to allow you to access equity or simply lower your monthly payments can be considered. Some applicants are fortunate to have loved ones that can help them with financial support during the interim period. If you can no longer pay your medical bills, seek assistance. It is important that you do not stop your medical care. Some churches and non profits have programs to help with prescription costs. Look into state health assistance programs. Find free clinics, if need be, for routine visits. Many medical offices will help individuals in financial need by coming up with bill payment strategies. Knowing that you are applying for disability, billing departments are more willing to work with you. You may also consider applying for local, state and federal public benefit programs. General Assistance is a state program that can lend you money that will have to be repaid after your social security disability case has been processed. Filing for food stamps and housing assistance may be beneficial for you, if the application process takes longer than expected. If you are in financial dire straights, you might consider talking to a social security attorney. You may be eligible for dire need assistance with social security. Dire need status can grant you financial assistance and help your case be processed more quickly.

Q: Is it possible to apply for social security disability benefits at an actual Social Security office?

A: You can apply for social security disability insurance online, over the phone or in person. Most people believe handling it in person is the most advantageous. A face to face appointment with the disability manager who will handle your case gives opportunities for real contact that applying online or via telephone will not. The meeting will be your first opportunity to provide background on your claim and medical condition, and the disability case manager will get to see how your condition currently affects your ability to function. This initial meeting sets the stage for the rest of process. To request an initial appointment in person, call Social Security and tell them you would like to apply for social security disability insurance in person. You will then receive a confirmation of the scheduled appointment via mail.

Q: How long does a claim for social security disability benefits take?

A: The duration can range anywhere from months to years. A decision for a normal case that has all the required materials is made within 90 days or so. Try this Veterans disability lawyer . Social security benefits orlando . Orlando social security attorney . Social security attorney orlando . Social security attorney .

About the Author

Find more information about social security disability lawyer, visit HilandPonton.com.

Source: <http://www.seo27.com>